This 'theatre in a house' was created in 1961 by Patric and Rosalie Carey when they extended the living room of their house in London Street into an auditorium, converting it into a small, 30 seat theatre which they called The Globe. This was later modified into the 72 seat theatre which exists today. The original house is a fine example of 19th century domestic architecture, having been designed by and built for Dunedin's first mayor, William Mason, in the 1860s.

The Careys were active in promoting both classical and new theatre to Dunedin audiences and also the works of New Zealand playwrights such as James K Baxter. The Careys moved from the Globe in 1973 but the theatre and its traditions continue, under the care of the Incorporated Society known as the Friends of the Globe Theatre. The Globe is now an amateur theatre, dependent for its survival on the continuing efforts of volunteers, its many Friends, who help stage an average of about five or six productions each year. Some are classical – Shakespeare is a favourite of course - others are gems of the more modern European and American theatre. The Globe is also producing even more of the works of New Zealand writers, a number of whom are Dunedin-based.

The Friends are also much involved with the preservation of the original house, one of only a few of its kind remaining in this area. The importance of both the house and the theatrical work of the Careys and the Friends of the Globe has been recognised by the New Zealand Historic Places Trust which now lists the Globe Theatre as a Category I historic building.

While the theatrical environment in Dunedin has changed considerably since the 1960s, the wishes of many people to see and/or participate in amateur theatre which is produced to high standards has not changed. If you too would like to become involved in the workings of this theatre in any capacity, on stage, behind the scenes, in the conservation of the building - or simply as an audience member who is given a discount on admission, we would be delighted to welcome you as a Friend of the Globe.
