NEXT PRODUCTION
Home by David Storey
The setting is a lovely day in a sunny park. Two elderly gentlemen (Harry Love and John Watson) chat for a while before being joined by two equally elderly and chatty ladies (Mary Greet and Kay Thompson). All is bright and cheerful, the chat like that heard in any bar or bowling club, ranging over all manner of different topics. But gradually it become apparent that all is not as it seems.

As the director, Louise Petherbridge, has commented,

"The play is very funny indeed; however, there is tragedy beneath the surface as the four elderly people try to make the most of life under what are challenging circumstances, to say the least."

This play is a classic, first performed in London in 1970, with John Guilgud and Ralph Richardson as the two elderly gentlemen, actors who would never embark on a work of a young playwright they could not trust. It was a brilliant success then and remains so today.
